Does a School Construction Advisor Make Sense for Your Next Project?

If your school district is about to undertake a multimillion-dollar new building project or a major renovation project you may want to consider the following:

- Does anyone on your staff know what the school districts role is during such a project?
- Do they have the time and expertise to make the hundreds of decisions they will be asked?
- Do they know how to lead and direct the architect and construction manager?
- Will they know what to do if the architect and construction manager disagree?

The Ennis Britton Consulting Group has recently expanded to provide services that specifically support school leaders during the design and construction of new building or major renovation projects. EBCG now offers School Construction Advisor services.

What is a School Construction Advisor?

A school construction advisor (sometimes also called an owner's agent or owner's representative) is a consultant, hired by the school district to provide their professional expertise and experience to those school district personnel assigned the responsibilities of a major construction project. A school construction advisor does not replace the architect or construction manager, rather they compliment their services by helping your administrative team effectively assume their role and responsibilities during the life of the project.

The following are four core reasons to consider using a School Construction Advisor:

1. To help your school district make the best possible decisions.
2. To manage risk.
3. To add experience to your districts administrative team.
4. To save money.

Ennis Britton Group Construction Advisor Services.

EBC staff have a blend of architectural, construction and educational experience that makes our team unique and more qualified than any other consultants providing these services in Ohio. All our professionals have over 30 years of experience in their area of expertise. Many of our team members are former school leaders, who have both architectural and construction expertise. They have been responsible for many successfully completed large-scale construction projects and they know the challenges your administrative team will be facing!
